

I think that Mohandas Gandhi was a very successful person. He was such an affable, diplomatic and ambitious person that he was able to peacefully make India independent from British colonists. His placid speeches united India to fight without any violence and to also accept those who were different and even those who believed in some other religion.

He was also a very broad-minded politician. Not only he sought to create a sovereign state which was always an essential goal for any governor throughout history but he also fought for things which were almost never to be seen before, such as expanding women's rights, eliminating poverty and bringing belligerent religions to peace.
